Causal Discovery from Observational Data Training Course

Introduction

Understanding and researching sensitive topics—such as mental health, gender-based violence, trauma, or socio-political injustices—requires not only technical research skills but also emotional intelligence, ethical considerations, and culturally responsive methodologies. Causal Discovery from Observational Data Training Course provides advanced training in conducting ethically sound and methodologically robust research on sensitive issues, with a special focus on using causal discovery from observational data. Through this program, researchers will gain deep insights into hidden causal relationships without conducting controlled experiments—critical in contexts where intervention is impossible or unethical.

This comprehensive, hands-on course integrates qualitative sensitivity with quantitative causal inference, emphasizing data-driven decision-making, machine learning, Bayesian networks, and ethical research design. Participants will learn to extract causal relationships, validate models, and implement evidence-based solutions in complex and sensitive domains such as healthcare, social justice, human rights, and public policy. By the end of this course, learners will be empowered to uncover truth responsibly, even in challenging environments.

Course Objectives

- Understand core principles of ethical research in sensitive contexts.
- Gain expertise in causal inference using observational data.
- Design sensitive research instruments that respect participant well-being.
- Apply Bayesian networks and graphical models for causal discovery.
- Learn data anonymization and privacy-preserving techniques.
- Navigate IRB approval processes and ethical dilemmas.
- Use machine learning to support causal discovery.
- Build structural causal models (SCM) for real-world problems.
- Conduct bias-aware data analysis in sensitive settings.
- Identify latent variables affecting outcomes in human-centered research.
