Healthy City Design and Planning Training Course

Introduction

Healthy City Design and Planning Training Course provides comprehensive knowledge and practical skills for integrating public health, urban planning, environmental sustainability, climate resilience, inclusive mobility, and smart-city principles into modern urban development. The course examines how urban form, housing, transportation, green infrastructure, public spaces, sanitation, air quality, water security, food systems, and social infrastructure influence population health and quality of life. Participants will explore evidence-based healthy city planning frameworks, health impact assessment, sustainable urban design, active mobility, nature-based solutions, and resilient infrastructure strategies aligned with global urban development priorities and the Sustainable Development Goals.

The course also develops practical capabilities for designing inclusive, safe, accessible, and climate-resilient cities through integrated planning and stakeholder engagement. Participants will examine international best practices, urban health indicators, spatial planning tools, community participation, data-driven decision-making, and Public-Private Partnership approaches for delivering healthy urban infrastructure and services. Global case studies will demonstrate how cities are addressing urban inequality, pollution, congestion, climate risks, physical inactivity, inadequate housing, and public-space deficiencies while strengthening economic, environmental, and social outcomes.
